				Playpack Cue Length

We are often asked for a "regulation size" billiard table. Regulation size simply means the play area is twice as long as it is wide measured from the nose of the cushions. Any table is considered to be regulation size if the length to width ratio meets these standards, and all California House tables are "regulation size".

When choosing a pool table, you will first want to make sure the table fits in the room with enough space around the table so that the cue doesn't hit your wall when addressing a ball at the rail. The measurements above show you the minimum dimensions needed, with options for different size cues.

The next thing to consider when choosing a pool table size (provided you have a room large enough), is the purpose of the table and who will be playing. Generally speaking, the smaller the table, the easier the game will be. If you plan to go pro, by all means, have at the 9' (50" x 100") table, which is the size used in professional tournament play! If you simply want to hang out with friends and family, 8' (44" x 88") is the most popular residential size, and if you plan to play with younger children, we would even recommend a 7' (38" x 76") table. Most pool tables found in bars are 7' so they get to turn more games.

A pool table can be a fantastic item to bring families and friends together, and should be viewed as a piece of furniture that accentuates your room and style. When choosing the perfect table for your family, we recommend making sure it fits in the room, make sure you like the style and finish, and then make sure the table is a size everyone can play on - in that order. You should experience a lifetime of fun with your purchase.
